Dogs can harm wildlife

Keep them under proper control to minimise disturbance to wildlife, livestock and other users.

Footprints only

The narrow path is on a Scheduled Monument and is therefore not suitable for horse riding or motorised vehicles

Wildlife Watching

In spring, listen for the cry of the curlew and the skylark song. Watch out for a passing ravens or hen harriers hunting low over the moorland.

Look out for sundew and butterwort, these plants trap and digest insects on their sticky leaves to survive on poor soil. Look out for Tiger Beetles.

Kelly Cut Walk

The Kelly Cut is 6.5 km (4 miles) in length, giving a return walk of 13 km (8 miles) or it is a 9.6 km (6 mile) linear walk from the Greenock Cut Visitor Centre to the railway station at Wemyss Bay.

Views overlook the Clyde towards Dunoon and the Argyll mountains and the Isles of Bute and Arran.

Habitat Native broadleaved woodlands flank the Kip Water in Shielhill Glen. Scrub birch woods lead to open heather moorland for much of the walk.

Peat Large areas of peat overlay old lava flows up to 1km thick. Scottish peat is a massive carbon store, holding up to 90% of all carbon stored in soils, plants and forests in the UK. A hectare of active peat bog also stores 250kg of carbon every year. Conservation and enhancement of peatlands is a major action to combat climate change.

Why the name the 'Kelly Cut'?

- Late in the 15th Century, James III granted the lands of Kelly to the Bannatyne family, who went on to hold this land for almost 300 years.
- They built the original Kelly Castle next to the Kelly Burn, it was destroyed by fire in 1740 and never rebuilt.
- The Kelly aqueduct (or Cut) was built in 1845, to supplement the water supply for the Greenock Cut.
- It has an elevation of 500 ft above sea level.

Kelly Cut by Betty McKellar

Above the Cornalees, against the sky—
a paraglider balanced on a crag;
he leans out into space and lays himself
upon the breathing of the wind so that he drifts over the frozen waters of Loch Thom towards the ancient Celtic lands
of Kelly and the silvered sea of the Clyde.

Silence is his music.
He glides to its rhythms
flying with the buzzard
like a great blue bird of happiness
into the softened face of winter
for sunlight suffuses the powdered hills with gold and illuminates Blood Moss
to glowing copper red.

He sees the Earth has healed her wounds —
the reservoirs her jewels now,
the cuts a shine of inlaid metal thread.
Stone dykes hang like necklaces around her shoulders
where summer stonechats chatter
and the roe deer stray;
birch and rowan trees dress the empty hallows
in winter grey.

And tiny people walk her pathways
far below him
listening, listening
to the music of the silence,
watching a blue bird of happiness
soaring
above their heads.
